LOHAS represents Lifestyles Of Health And Sustainability. This concept was first informed by an American sociologist Paul Ray in his book, "The Cultural Creatives: How 50 Million People are Changing the World." The definition of LOHAS is to reveal a sense of responsibility towards selves and families in terms of health and environment while making a consumption decision. The particular group of people personally carries out the belief of LOHAS by buying products that will not contaminate the environment as well as provide nutrition for their family and themselves. The lifestyles include organic diet, nutrition supplementary, yoga, natural therapy, and personal growth readings in order to pursue health both in body and mind.

Although the definition of LOHAS is based on the American context, the lifestyle is prevalent all over the world. It is also identical to another movement – Slow Food. Both reflect the unhealthy ingredients and process in fast food. Moreover, the concept of Simple Living was even mentioned earlier than LOHAS and hasn't yet been widely introduced to the world. Hence, it is obvious that the modern lifestyle has gradually become health and sustainability oriented with a simple taste and a slow pace.
