Windshield wipers of a car were invented by Mary Anderson on a trip in New York City in 1903. While touring the city on a streetcar, Mary was not interested in the views on the streets. Instead, she paid much attention to the streetcar motorman. Repeatedly, the motorman had to get out of the streetcar to wipe off the snow and ice collected on the windshield. New York streetcar motormen at that time had tried various ways to solve this problem. Wiping off the snow and ice by hands, however, seemed to be the only solution. Mary, sitting on her seat, quickly drew her device in her sketchbook. Her solution was simple. Mary’s device allowed the motorman to use a lever inside the streetcar to activate a swinging arm on the windshield to wipe off the snow and ice. Because the device was first designed for cold weather, it could be easily removed when warmer weather arrived. Its function of wiping rain was later considered and added. Even though her friends teased her about her awkward invention attached to a streetcar, Mary didn’t give in to peer pressure. A year later, she received a patent for it. By 1913, her invention became standard equipment on American cars. Windshield wipers save lives and make it easier to drive through storms.

41. Which of the following is the best title for the passage?

Unlike any earlier building complex anywhere in the world, Rockefeller Center in New York City was built, not as a place where people could live, but as a city in which they could work. It was the biggest building project of its kind, a city within a city, and the forerunner of projects that have sprung up all over the world. Thirty architects, 1200 draftsmen, and hundreds of other artists and technicians were employed just to draft the plans. Before the buildings could be erected, 229 old buildings had to be emptied of 4,000 tenants and razed. Just to buy up the leases took over two years and cost over $6,000,000. The unusual shape and setbacks of the seventy-story RCA building resulted primarily from practical considerations such as lighting, the movement of people, and the building’s services. The lower concourse and basement level were set aside for shops. A sunken plaza, complete with gardens and fountains, was designed to provide access to these shops. Today the plaza, which is used for ice-skating in winter and dining and dancing in summer, is one of the center’s most popular attractions.
